Written by Samuel Zimmerman
Wednesday, 21 March 2012 11:46

The latest from THE ECHO's Yam Laranas hits the U.S. this May.

THE ROAD sees a years-old cold case reopened when three kids go missing on a long-abandoned stretch of road, and investigators unfurl the secrets it holds.

Here's a fuller synopsis from Laranas' blog: "An abandoned stretch of road in the middle of nowhere. A man is sitting behind the wheel of his car. He takes a pistol and blows his brains out. We jump into time. Three teenagers sneak out of the house at night to take a drive in their mother's car. When they hit a police check point, they take a turn and end up on a dark, abandoned road. After a while, a car starts to overtake them. There's nobody behind the wheel. The teenagers panic and try to get back on the highway. But the road does not let them go. A hysterical phone call is the last their parents hear of them. The next morning, the police are puzzled. The search the surroundings and find traces that lead them to a ten year old disappearance case, where two sisters went missing without a trace. A talented, young officer tries to find the link between these two cases. But the road does not give up its gruesome secrets without a heavy price to pay.

THE ROAD, whose trailer holds an eerie, supernatural tone, will hit VOD and limited theatrical release May 11, Variety reports.

{youtube}O6DzbIRh92g{/youtube}