Written by Samuel Zimmerman
Monday, 24 October 2011 15:32

Earlier this month, it was announced that BLAIR WITCH PROJECT producer Kevin Foxe recently took to New Orleans to direct a tale of students experimenting with apparitions. Head below to check out Fango's very early chat with the filmmaker about THE GHOST EXPERIMENT in 3D, as well as the first photos.

THE GHOST EXPERIMENT takes inspiration from an odd and intriguing 1970's study that saw eight people attempt to "create a ghost," crafting a biography for a long-dead fellow named Philip and subsequently holding seances to contact this fictional person; seances that produced results.

Here's the official synopsis: "Can you create a ghost? Inspired by a real-life incident documented in the 70's, a group of students attempt to recreate this 'ghost experiment' in the present day. Cordoning themselves in an abandoned house in New Orleans, the students attempt to manifest a ghost by tapping into raw human emotion. As their investigation yields shocking results, each slowly falls victim to their own dangerous undertaking." THE GHOST EXPERIMENT stars Shane McNichol, Megan Rosati, Henry Kober, Stephanie Lomenick and Chris Sibley.

FANGORIA: When did you first learn about the source incident, and what was it about it that sparked a film?

KEVIN FOXE: It was sent to me from the producer Valerio Zanoli, who is a fellow horror fan, and we started talking about it. The idea that there are people out there experimenting with the idea of ghosts and the supernatural, not hunting them, was intriguing. It reminded me of the famous 21 grams experiment, which always made me think, and this was even more compelling.