What will the follow-up of Gareth Edwards' incredible Sci(lo)-fi tale of two people finding each other amidst giant, tentacled extraterrestrials entail?

Shock Till You Drop has revealed the official synopsis of MONSTERS: DARK CONTINENT. To be directed by one Tom Green and produced by Edwards, from a script by Jay Basu, the sequel to looks to be keeping in tone with the journey nature of the first, this time with an American soldier taking the lead, seven years after the events of the original.

"Seven years on from the events of MONSTERS, and the ‘Infected Zones’ have spread worldwide. Humans have been knocked off the top of the food chain, with disparate communities struggling for survival. American soldiers are being sent abroad to protect US interests from the Monsters, but the war is far from being won."

"Noah, a haunted soldier with several tours under his belt, is sent on a mission: an American soldier has gone rogue deep in the Infected Zone, and Noah must reach him and take him out. But when Noah's unit and transport are destroyed, he finds himself with only a young and inexperienced cadet for company - the brother of the man Noah has been sent to kill."

"The two soldiers must go on a life-altering journey through the dark heart of monster territory, accompanied by a young local woman to guide them. By the time the three of them reach their goal, they will have been forced to confront the fear that the true monsters on the planet may not be alien after all."

If you haven't seen, MONSTERS is currently available on Netflix Instant. It is highly recommended.